Dear Editor,

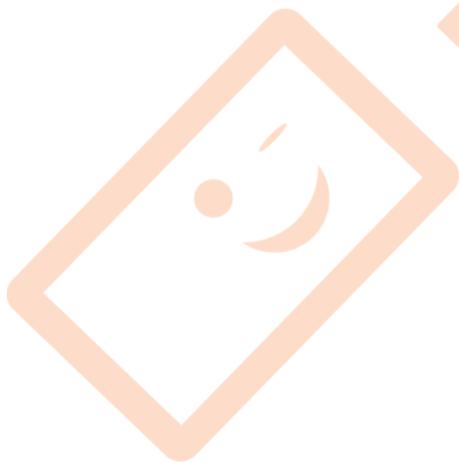

I am writing with regard to your article which referred to “the millennial generation “ and which has caused quite a number of controversies. Being a “millennial” myself, I would like to express my point of view on the issue.

Concerning the enlisted characterizations, I obviously disagree to some extent. Specifically speaking, individuals born in this time period have proven to be not only active but also well informed. People have the will to expand their knowledge and are open to new ideas. Besides this, as conscious individuals we have the ability to distinguish right from wrong. Unfortunately, the economic crisis has led us to being uncertain for the future which in other cases would be taken for granted.

We are all familiar with the current worldwide situation meaning our occupation with technology. From an early age, we get used to handling such devices, adjusting to today's needs. For instance, the use of cell phones, gadgets, the internet and so on has become part of our daily routine. Of course, all the above have driven us to isolation, lack of face to face communication and even more surprisingly to depression.

All things considered, all generations are a blend of pros and cons of their era. Judged for something that we are not, is totally unfair.

Yours sincerely,
Alex Georgiou
